Woman's Laugh.

BY GEORGE ADAMS.

I've pondered over every sound Whose schoes thrill the soul, I've searched those melodies profound Whose numbers round me roll; But sought in vain the magic spell Which bids each care depart, When ripples from fair woman's lips The joy which fills her heart,

There's music in the summer breeze And the glad water's flow, I hear amid the forest leaves An anthem, soft and low: But when from woman's ruby lips Is borne upon the air Her overflow of happiness,

She reigns unrivalled there. The ocean's wild, majestic tone Resounds from clime to clime, The noble organ fills the soul With harmony sublime; But these must ever yield the palm

When woman's heart sets free, From love-lit syes and teeth of pearl, A flood of ecstacy. That laugh can gild with joy the clouds Of sorrow, toil and pain ;

Can cause the deserts of the heart To blossom o'er again ; Can melt the fetters of the world-Its coldness and its pride, Can lift the veil from fortune's face, And cast her frown aside.

That ringing laugh the echoes wake O'er earth, and sea, and air; It links the mingled songs of time With angel voices fair. Call this no more a "vale of tears," While gushes, full and free, From woman's lips, and eyes, and soul,

That heaven-born melody,
